S26 and all that...

In late September, you may remember seeing news footage of tear gas and numerous outlets of McDonalds in need of a glazier's attention.

It was probably the coverage of the demonstrations in Prague against the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF) that you were watching, although there's far more to the real story than TV sensationalism. How do I know? Because during the second week of my holiday fortnight in the Czech Republic, I gave up more conventional tourist activities for a while and took a look for myself.

The World Bank and the IMF are coming under mounting criticism for their actions. One of the World Bank's central roles is to ensure that developing countries have the physical infrastructure necessary to engage in the global economy. However, in many cases this has led to environmental damage and the displacement and intimidation of indigenous people, while topping-up the bank accounts of transnational corporations in the process. The IMF gives loans to cash-strapped developing countries in return for "structural adjustment" (now called the "Comprehensive Development Framework") within that country. This can mean cuts in health and education, privatisation and the deregulation of labour markets (sound familiar?). Not surprising then that the meeting in Prague of the IMF and World Bank this Sept attracted thousands of protestors from around the world. The protests culminated in a mass demonstration and marches to the conference centre on Sept 26, designated the "People's Global Day of Action".

We first had a taste of the crackdown to come when reports came through of trains and buses being turned away from the Czech borders in anticipation of the demonstration. Figures of around 10,000 people being refused entry have been estimated. (My friend's arrival from England was delayed by almost 2 hours thanks to unusually thorough border searches).

Come the 26th, the day started good-humoured enough, with protestors splitting-up into three marches; blue, yellow and pink. The idea was to surround the conference centre and, hopefully, to stop the proceedings. We were on the yellow march, which included trade unionists, environmentalists and socialists. At the front of the march was Ya Basta!, the Italian direct action group.

When the march reached the bridge leading towards the centre, we were met with Czech riot police, a water cannon and a tank (they're bigger than you think!), and the march was declared to be illegal. Ya Basta! spent over two hours trying to dismantle the police barricades, during which time they were beaten and heavily contaminated with pepper spray. We could hear the sound of stun grenades exploding beneath the bridge, where the blue march was also coming under attack.

Although protestors didn't get into the conference centre, neither could the delegates get out for several hours. A peaceful occupation of the Opera house stopped the delegates' social event, so they had to make do with a banquet on the edge of town.

Later in the evening, trouble broke out on Wenceslas Square, when riot police armed with teargas and stun grenades decided to clear the square, assaulting and arresting tourists in the process. Later that evening and over the following couple of days, police arbitrarily arrested people, often for doing no more than walking down the street. Out of the hundreds rounded up, detained and/or deported, only a handful has been charged. More worrying still have been the accounts of police brutality against those arrested. I met several people who had visibly been severely beaten in the police cells just before and following the demonstration who were then released without charge, and spoke to numerous others who had witnessed acts of violence in the Czech police cells. Unlike the images of protestors attacking McDonalds or throwing stones at police, these are stories that most of the press has chosen to ignore.

So was it all worth it? Well, whatever you think about the protests, it's a fact that many people who would otherwise never have heard about the World Bank or the IMF are starting to ask questions, and from a personal point of view, it felt good to be part of that process. Finally, if you still think globalization is nothing to do with us, I came back to the news that Johnson Controls, a factory in Mansfield, was closing with the loss of 600 jobs. The reason? They are relocating to the Czech Republic, where labour costs are a fraction of ours. The people making vast profits at the expense of people like you and me went global along time ago. It's about time we did the same.

Veggies & The Rainbow Centre Moving On

■ Since our beginnings in 1984/5, sharing an office in a single building together with Nottingham's FoE and CND groups, The Rainbow Centre and Veggies Catering Campaign have expanded to burst the seams of a 7-unit terrace of shops, offices, cafe, library, campaign resources and collective housing.

Many projects and many volunteers have come and gone over the years, but in this new millennium the time is right to break out of the confines of rented accommodation and seek a permanent base, purchased as an investment in the future, and as a statement of our ongoing commitment to the causes of human and animal rights, environmental protection, peace, co-operation and social justice.

We have given notice to quit our Mansfield Road premises, with a new Centre 'under offer' to buy, subject to our raising £22,000 deposit (offers welcome). An Ecology Building Society mortgage is being sought for the balance. We may be ready to move late December or early in 2001.

We are writing a detailed business plan, which will be on line in a week's time, and would be greatly helped by donations, as this will reduce the amount we would have to pay back in interest on a bank loan.

Can You Help ??? !!!

Our address and phone numbers have literally spread around the planet, as part of a 'vast and extensive' network. If you wish to keep in touch with the Rainbow Centre or Veggies please return the form included in this mailing.

Nottingham postal workers

win five day week

■ Postal workers at the Nottingham South delivery office have scored a fantastic victory and set an example for postal workers across the country - winning a five-day week by refusing to do duties beyond the call of their job descriptions.

Massive non-delivery of letters took place at Nottingham South postal delivery office for the past few weeks after most workers refused to work uninsured - for free! - before 5 am, and refused to use their own cars.

Instead, we insisted on our right to refuse overtime, to take meal breaks at the right time and to have sacks of mail delivered to us on our rounds.

Management have spent hundreds of thousands of pounds in just two weeks of our action. Up to 80 members of management and 50 specially-drafted in agency staff proved themselves unable to cover the work that we are normally forced to do for free!

The dispute arose after plans to give a five-day week - a major demand of postal workers across the country - to half the workers at Nottingham South was over-ruled by the Area Manager.

His intervention meant virtually no-one was offered a five day week - and that second deliveries were five times the size of first deliveries. Our work to rule forced managers to shift the mail: it was very enjoyable seeing bully managers from all over the area stacking mail.

We will never go back to the attitude of the pre-action days. There has been a sea change in workers' attitudes because of this victory and we all know we now hold the key to improvements in our conditions and quality of life: solidarity.

Messages are arriving that other offices are following our example, and Distribution (mail lorries) are also balloting for industrial action.

Even though all levels of the union - up to and including the national level - have so far backed us, we know our union does not control us as we have not had industrial action, so it is not their legal duty to support or "repudiate" our action: all we've done is do our jobs properly! A few individuals decided to insist on their rights; the rest joined them as their own individual decision: this was not industrial action in the eyes of the law.

We are, though, acutely aware that the law and judges and the media would not be as soft as they have been on the oil companies, hauliers and farmers taking part in the fuel protests as they would be on us in the event of any legal challenge to our action. We plan to sponsor a public meeting on the law and industrial action and also to make links with anti-capitalist protestors, anti-fascists, fuel protestors and local labour movement bodies.

■ Brother / Sister

Following a discussion and resolution at the Regional Council of NATFHE, the Notts Area Committee of NATFHE has decided to call a meeting to which trade union organisations in the area are invited.

NATFHE, in this region, has been greatly disappointed by the performance of this New Labour government, on the funding of education and the failure of the government to reverse Tory anti-union legislation and increase workers' rights.

We are aware that dissatisfaction is felt not only by our members, but also the members of other unions, on the wider failures of the government to restore welfare state provisions on health and pensions, and to protect the public services. We have therefore decided to consult other unions about the possibilities of joint campaigning in the period up to the General Election. We believe that, given the policies of this government, trades unions are compelled to campaign for their policies independently of the main political parties. We believe that such policies, particularly that of greater spending on the welfare state, enjoy great support not only amongst our memberships but also amongst the electorate.

Representatives from your union organisation would be most welcome.

In solidarity

Pete Radcliff,

NATFHE Notts Area Committee

Simon Jones Campaign

■ The CPS have finally decided to prosecute - unfortunately rather than prosecute anyone for Simon's death, they've decided to prosecute one of the campaign's supporters who was simply exercising his right (along with about 80 of us) to protest outside the CPS offices in London.

Warren was arrested during our demo on 1st September, and has been charged with assaulting a police officer (like the rest of us, he was just trying to avoid being crushed onto the pavement by the police). Our solicitor Matt Foot of Christian Fisher is appealing for witnesses. If you were at the demo, or saw anything, please call him on 0207 691 4394.

Meanwhile we've still heard nothing from the CPS as to whether they have any intention of prosecuting the real criminals...

Thanks for your support,
The Simon Jones Memorial Campaign

Defend Glenn Kelly

disciplinary hearing, his case was adjourned until 1st November.

Bromley Council in South London have suspended Glenn Kelly, UNISON branch secretary, chair of the Campaign for a Fighting Democratic UNISON.

Bromley acted after Glenn, as secretary of the public sector union UNISON, played a leading role in campaigning to save the Night Care service for the elderly living in the council's sheltered accommodation.

Notts Socialist Alliance

The A-Z of New Labour disappointment goes on and on: scapegoating asylum seekers, selling off council housing, under-funding education, failing to protect the environment from big business, the fuel crisis, privatization of the National Health Service, a pathetic minimum wage, excusing police racism, failing to act on rail safety and the list goes on and on. Come to the Socialist Alliance launch rally, hear the socialist alternative to New Labour's pro-big business politics and take part in the fight back for a fair and decent society.
